

As a resident of Indiana, the do-not-call list has greatly reduced the level of stress in our home. The phone rings about 10% of what it did before the law went into effect. After all, shouldn't we be able to expect privacy in our homes? If you mess with the Indiana law and let unwanted callers invade our home, what can be considered "in the privacy of your own home"? Simply by accident, unwanted calls grew over the years from courtesy to down right intimidation until they crossed the line of decency. Don't mess with Indiana's tremendously successful efforts to give privacy back to its citizens. Thank You
